Murray Faces Critics And Lewis Aides

Says Harmony Marked Visit Despite His Rift With Labor Chieftain

By the Associated Press

Philip Murray faced his critics today at a joint meeting of the United Mine Workers' Policy Committee and Executive Board.

Mr. Murray, who is vice president of the Miners' Union, as well as president of C. I. O., walked into a gathering dominated by friends and lieutenants of John L. Lewis, president of the miners. Mr. Lewis and Mr. Murray have been estranged for months.

The meeting had not formally begun when Mr. Murray appeared. He chatted with acquaintances until after the appointed hour for the start of the session, then went to his office upstairs in the union's headquarters.

Harmonious Meeting. Stopped by newsmen en route, Mr. Murray said no unpleasantness marked his first visit to the meeting hall. He said he would return to the meeting, but would not discuss his plans otherwise. Mr. Lewis was not in the hall at the tilme, he said. The miners' chieftain appeared about 10 minutes later and received an ovation that was heard outside in the street. Mr. Murray returned to the hall later, it was learned, and addressed the delegates, as did Mr. Lewis and

Thomas Kennedy, secretary-treasurer. Neither Mr. Murray nor his friends would disclose immediately the nature of his remarks. Asked at the luncheon recess whether the meeting was harmonious, Mr. Murray replied "Yes." An source said the morning meeting was devoted exclusively to the formalities of organization, including brief opening addresses and
